The Ethics of Service

Veterans' Day is a national day of reflection and appreciation to those who have served this country in the US Military. There are many service professions such as education, medicine, first responders and social services, but the military is unique in the special demands and sacrifices that anyone joining a branch of the military can be called upon to make. The sacrifices range from reduced income and missing family events during deployments, to physical and psychological wounds and the ultimate sacrifice of their own life.

We are 58 years removed from President John F. Kennedy's famous inaugural charge of, "Ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country." When compared to the current presidential campaign, when candidates are promising trillions of dollars in government spending the call to service seems quaint. This is while Ed Week (see link) has recently published research on the downward trend of volunteering among young people.

Students are asked to consider what core values support a person's motivation to a life of service in any form? Do students consider vocations of service an ethical good? Finally, in addition to the motivation to serve, what social and professional skills might help a service professional be successful?
